Most check documents are printed on paper, typically of a small format, in an effort to make them more convenient for check deposit and to reduce loss of checks by theft. To further encourage check deposit, many jurisdictions have "pay at the counter" schemes, in which the customer is given a check deposit slip at the point of purchase, and the check is deposited directly into an account. Paper check documents require the insertion of both the check and the deposit slip into an account which has an account number and personal identification number (PIN) or signature. In a system in which the customer is given the check and deposit slip to complete at the point of purchase, both the check and deposit slip must be inserted into the account. In some instances, a customer may have no signature on file with the financial institution. When this occurs, an imprinted check with the customer's name or initials is typically provided for the customer to sign and deliver to the financial institution along with the deposit slip for the check. In other instances, signatures may be voluntarily provided by the customer. However, in all cases, the customer is required to maintain the check together with the deposit slip when passing through check acceptance devices, such as ATM machines, xe2x80x9cbill caddiesxe2x80x9d and the like. This requirement of maintaining both documents when passing through check acceptance devices has proven troublesome for most customers, particularly those who have multiple financial institutions with whom they transact business. The customer is required to keep track of the various check and deposit slip combinations, either in paper form or in the form of electronic files, and the customer must be constantly vigilant regarding misplacing or losing a check or deposit slip combination, or having to misplace or lose the documents.
